The gang of bill posters in Brooklyn who have followed Kenny as their chief, both on account of the protection he gave them, and through fear of him, is likely to be broken up, and the business which Kenny has heretofore made perilous for rivals will pass into different bands. which Kenny has heretofore made perilous for rivals will pass into different hands. Kenny has been assisted in his trial by contributions from bill posters all over the country, who have sent money to him in response to circulars which his brothers sent out.

In looking up Kenny's record Detective Zundt discovered that he had been arrested thirty-four times in Brooklyn. He has long borne a reputation for recklessness with firearms, and when he shot Paulding, the bill poster, and Dwyer, the brother of Alderman Dwyer, and fired three times at the lather of Minnie Terwilliger when in his shep one day, he acted apparently without provocation.

Kenny has been remarkably cool during his trial, and his old companions have been impressed with his nerve in facing the circumstantial evidence that threatened him with the gallows. He seemed wholly emotionless, and it is said that he trusted to luck to escape the death penalty. He will not risk another rial, but will go to prison sanguine of a pardon sooner or later. Frank McGovern realizes that he has had a narrow escape from Kenny's fate. The day he was arrested, while on his way to the police station, one of Kenny's friends advised him to claim the letter from Minnie Terwilliger found near Lennon's body, and but for the whispered advice of Tom Fields, a more sincere friend, who warned him that the triends of Kenny were trying 'to put up a job on him.' McGovern might, in his desire to save Kenny, have yielded. The theory that Kenny killed Lennon because the latter recognized him, after Kenny had robbed him and had passed his watch to McGovern, is generally secepted. Assistant District Attorney Backus said yeasterday that if Kenny had robbed him and had passed his watch to McGovern, is generally secepted. Assistant Lennon's recognition of his robber proved fatal. Kenny had no escape then except by taking the man's life, for, not having the watch, he could not return it, and the timepiece was so necessary to the car driver that Lennon, who had been asleen, but who was not v

Between the death of one Apis and the finding of another bull marked in the same way the whole country was in mourning. Wall street is in a similar predicament. It will romain in mourning till it finds a new Aois. Like Egypt, it possesses many very handsome and powerful bulls, but they do not answer the required description of a genuine, leading Apis. They made a strong combination in the beginning of the month. but it began to break to pieces the week before last, and kept on breaking last week. It is ovident that no herd of even the finest bulls can take the place of an individual leader with the sacred Apis marks. Mr. Gould is black enough, and could easily have some symbolic spots tattooed on his back; but he has no white spot about him, and, though he speaks very little and in a very low voice, it is not certain that that peculiarity is caused by the presence of a scarabseus under his tongue. In any case, he does not seem willing to come forward as a claimant for the digits are received as a considerable percentage of bear biond in them.

The position of the bull combination is, in fact, so precarious that but for a mysterious movement in the Denver and Rio grande stock, the whole market would probably have experienced a considerable percentage of bear blood in them.
